UNFI Team,

Here is a list of Campbell Soup/Wolfgang Puck items that contain BPA in the Steel cans or Lids.

Steel cans & Lids are among the safest, most convenient, affordable and environmentally sustainable forms of packaging in the world. Our cans are coated on the inside with a thin layer of plastic to separate the food from the metal. This helps keep the food safe and preserves its nutritional value. This lining contains a very small amount of a substance called bisphenol A or BPA. Extensive studies around the world have found that BPA is safe to use in packaging.

However, some consumers would like to avoid BPA which is why we will transition to using non-BPA linings and coatings in our packaging by the middle of 2017. In the U.S. and Canada, we began to ship cans which have linings made from acrylic or polyester materials in March 2016. We plan to have 75 percent of our soups in non-BPA lined cans by December 2016. As we ship nearly two billion cans each year, the transition will take some time. This transition includes introducing non-BPA coatings to V8 beverage cans, microwaveable bowls and screw-top lids on glass jars.

In the meantime, we will comply with the state of California's Prop 65 warning requirements for BPA (by May 11, 2016). The Grocery Manufacturers Association (GMA) will create point of sale signs and an online database of products which use BPA for California retailers. All of the items will be listed on this web site by May 11th.

Also as Items move to BPA Free linings we will update this list. Wolfgang Puck Soups are making the transition starting in July. At that time they will be removed from the list.
